The direct transfer of artistic gifts is impossible; artistic adaptation takes place through a series of contradictory phases: Shock — Wonder — Imitation — Rejection — Experimentation — Possession.
None of these phases can be avoided, though they need not all be gone through by any one individual.
Our practical conclusion is the following:
We are abandoning all efforts at pedagogical action and moving toward experimental activity.

a guy i work with is taking a sociology class at the community college. a couple of weeks ago he told me his professor had asked the class about the word "revolution", and the idea of revolution. the professor said the word had been removed from circulation, so to speak, no one used it or thought about it anymore. he presented this as as a calculated, systemic campaign designed to eliminate the idea, and thus its accompanying behavior. i agree that there has been a calculated, systemic campaign, but i very strongly disagree about exactly what that campaign has been, and how it has worked. the word "revolution" has been very widely used in recent decades, but always only in the context of advertising: the revolutionary new whatever, a revolution in whatever, the whatever revolution. i think the word is being used more than ever, but it has been recontextualized and repurposed. it has been emptied of its original meanings, and it has been trivialized. so, when for example someone occupying wall street uses the word, it now has to be decontextualized - not a simple task, to remove it from the context of advertising - and it has to be recontextualized and repurposed as non-trivial - again, no simple matter. if the word had simply gone out of circulation for a time, it would be easy to reintroduce it. but the word has actually been redefined - since efinitions, meanings, only occur in context, and the context has been radically changed and then consistently circulated, year after year, in television, on radio, in print, on billboards, etc and etc what you are doing is a form of writing against itself. the writing destabilizes itself at every turn, but it doesn't necessarily open itself to interpretation. it thwarts, and thereby discourages, the interpretative process. it isn't necessarily polysemous, though it may potentially be so (within a conventional periphery of reading), and it isn't asemic in any useful sense of that term: it is anti-semantic, or anti-semic. it refuses to produce meanings, whether collaborative or otherwise. so, if that is the case, or if that is at least my experience of reading this writing, then what is actually there, in fact, to be read? the decisions are there, the choices made during the production of the possibility of the reading experience i am describing. that is what you do here as an author, and that is what you offer to a reader, and it is at least as i see it very close to what authors have always done, have always offered, only here the anti-semantic nature of the text forces us as readers to consider what is left in a writing, once the option of producing meanings is removed - or, perhaps, once that option is presented as merely one choice, and not necessarily the most attractive or rewarding one available.

write or be written and beware of interpretations, of any kind the interpreters are writers too who think they can read our minds and then write them they don't want to read our minds, they want to write them to overwrite the writing we wrote in attending to the injunction: write or be written so our writing remains as a palimpsest at best they also follow the injunction: write or be written either they are written by our writing, or they are written by their own writing for them the choice is obvious we should be for them more trouble than we are worth
